GRAFFITI ARTIST TRANSFERRED TO NEW PRISON

Cuban prisoner of conscience and graffiti artist Danilo Maldonado Machado ('El Sexto') has been transferred to a new detention centre where he continues to be detained without charge since his arrest on 26 November. He now refuses to eat the food from the prison.

On 4 December Danilo Maldonado Machado (also known as 'El Sexto') was transferred to El Vivac prison in the outskirts of Havana, the capital of Cuba. His mother was able to visit him on 5 December and told Amnesty International that he now refuses to eat the food provided by the prison for fear of poisoning, but he ate the food brought to him by his mother.

Danilo Maldonado was arrested at his home in Havana the morning of 26 November, hours after the announcement of Fidel Castro's death. That same day, Cuba-based newspaper 14 y medio reported that he had graffitied the words "He's gone" (Se fue) on a wall in Havana. Nine days after Danilo Maldonado's arrest, Cuban authorities have still failed to present official charges under an internationally recognized offence against him. The authorities have not informed his mother or his lawyer of the reasons for this detention, nor a date for his release.

His family presented a Habeas Corpus request for the preservation of Danilo Machado's individual rights before the Provincial Court of Havana (Tribunal Provincial de la Habana) on 5 December seeking his immediate release.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

On 20 October 2015, Danilo Maldonado Machado was released after spending almost 10 months in prison without trial following accusations of “aggravated contempt”. Amnesty International considered him a prisoner of conscience, imprisoned solely for peacefully exercising his right to freedom of expression (see: <https://www.amnesty.org/en/documents/amr25/2710/2015/en/>).

Danilo Maldonado Machado was accused of “aggravated contempt” after being arrested on 25 December 2014 for transporting two pigs with the names “Raúl” and “Fidel” painted on them, which he intended to release in an art show in Havana’s Central Park.
